

Sarah Sundberg

1-29-12

Reasons for Divorce

I think it is sad people feel they don't need to be more committed and that they would rather go through a divorce because it is easier. I don't feel that the process of a divorce should be harder but I wish society would not accept it so easily. The main issue I observe when it comes to divorce is people are unwilling to compromise. The majority of people today are more self-centered and are taught that it is all about you.

If your reason for filing a divorce is because you fell out of love I think you should first need to go through some counseling where they could possibly plan some activities for you to do and opportunities for you to serve the other person. This I think would help them grow closer to each other to find the attraction because they most likely just grew apart from each other and need to be more involved in each other's life.

There would be some reasons I would consider a divorce. The first one I can think of would be if they were abusive to me, or anyone in the family, and had no desire to change. I would divorce my husband if he had a secret life and was involved in inappropriate activities. Lastly, if he told me he was gay I would definitely consider a divorce because I would not put up with that crap.